To Whom It May Concern,

It is my pleasure to recommend Yi Yao (Brian), who served as a Data Analysis Intern at Enpak. During his internship, Brian took on one of the most important strategic projects at our company: developing a data-driven market intelligence framework to guide Enpak's launch strategy. As an early-stage startup, we had little internal data available, so Brian built his analytical approach entirely from publicly available datasets and original modeling techniques. He embraced this challenge with professionalism, curiosity, and exceptional analytical rigor.

Brian designed and implemented a comprehensive market intelligence framework evaluating community demand, business density, event activity, demographic trends, and revenue opportunities across New York City's boroughs. He translated complex datasets into clear business insights that directly informed our launch priorities and long-term growth strategy.

One of Brian's greatest strengths is his ability to bridge technical analysis with practical business decision-making. Rather than simply presenting data, he explained what the findings meant for Enpak as a company.

Brian's final deliverables were of a quality suitable to share directly with founders, investors, and strategic partners. His work gave Enpak a valuable foundation for informed market launch decisions and will continue to shape our growth strategy going forward.

Beyond his technical abilities, Brian was a pleasure to work with, thoughtful, dependable, receptive to feedback, and consistently positive in approaching challenges. He communicated effectively, met deadlines, and showed genuine ownership of his work.

I have no doubt Brian will be a valuable asset to any organization seeking strong analytical capabilities, sound judgment, and a collaborative mindset. I recommend him without reservation and look forward to seeing all he accomplishes in his future career.

Should you require any additional information regarding Brian's work or performance at Enpak, please don't hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,
